Robertson

"Whatever influence is derived from titles of honour, the feodal Barons, likewise possessed in an ample manner. These marks of distinction are, in their own nature, either official or personal, the being annexed to a particular charge, or bestowed by the admiration of mankind upon illustrious characters, ought to be appropriated to these. But the son, however un-

worthy, could not
bear to be stripped
of that appellation
by wh his father had been dubbing wished.
His presumption
claimed what his
virtue did not me-
rit. titles of honor
became hereditary & added new lustre
to nobles already
in possession of too
much power.
Something more

audacious, and
more extravagant
still remained.
The supreme direc-
tion of all affairs,
both civil and
military, being committed to the
great officers of
crown, the fame
and safety of princes,
as well as of their
people, depended
upon the fidelity &
abilities of these officers. But such
was the preposterous

ambition of the
nobles & so successful
even their wildest
attempts to aggran-
dize themselves,
that in all the kingdoms where the feu-
dal institutions
prevailed, most
offices were
annexed to great families, & held, like
fiefs, by hereditary right.
A person, whose un
dutiful behaviour

Robertson often
bears witness to
the reformers by force of innovation
in liberty.

Ex. 1st These doctrines calculated to rectify
the opinions, & to
reform the manners
of mankind, had
hitherto produced no

other effects; but they soon began to operate with greater violence, & served the occasion, not only of subverting established religion but of shaking the throne & endangering the kingdom.

Many among the most eminent Reformers,
were themselves considerable masters in
ancient learning;
& all of them eagerly
adopted the principles
& spirit of the ancients with regard to government. The most ardent love of liberty accompanied
the protestant religion
throughout all its progress. and where-
ever it was embraced it roused an independent spirit,

wd rendered men attentive to their privileges as subjects, & jealous of the encroachments of their sovereigns. p. 183

There two Noblemen (Duke of Chatelherault & Earl of Huntley) the most potent at this time in Scotland were the leaders of the party, wd adhered to the established church (Romish). They had
